Emerging markets still under pressure

World

The currencies of several emerging countries have been increasingly weak since mid-April. The Federal Reserve's tightening of U.S. monetary policy is pushing the greenback up and increasing the debt level of some struggling countries, like Argentina and Turkey. American protectionism also clouds the economic perspectives of certain countries that are more dependent on exports. While this situation seems to differ from the Asia crisis of 1997-1998, when some countries had a fixed exchange rate regime, we are following an eventual contagion to developed economies, with an eye on the development of information on international trade.

North America

In Canada, the annual inflation rate accelerated sharply in July to reach 3%, the highest it has been in almost seven years. However, this sudden inflationary pressure is mainly due to the seasonal rebound in gas prices, which has jumped nearly 25% since last summer. The core inflation rate, which does not include more volatile components like gas and food, remained rather stable, around 2%. We do not expect hasty reactions from the Bank of Canada as it, and the markets, are awaiting further clarity from the NAFTA negotiations before making major changes to its monetary policy.

Financial markets

Despite the S&P 500, which continued to reach new highs, the tone in all financial markets has become more cautious. The emerging market stock index is officially a bear market, down more than 20% since its recent peak, and the Canadian S&P/TSX Index has been stagnant since the beginning of the summer. Despite this generally cautious tone, Canadian bonds are not fulfilling their role of safe haven, as the Bank of Canada, just like the Fed, is in the process of normalizing its monetary policy, with four key interest rate hikes since July 2017.
