Between the Delta variant and historic stock market highs

World

Summer 2021 is coming to an end and we're seeing a general slowdown of global economic activity. Since the peak observed at the start of summer, all economic surprises worldwide have lost their luster, due to the slowdown from the strong reactions of fiscal and monetary authorities in 2020. Now that economic reopening processes have taken root, we have moved on to a slower cruising speed as shown by the ISM manufacturing index, as shown opposite. While a slowdown is completely normal after the economic performance seen over the last 12 months, the question mark that is the Delta variant causes us to be cautious regarding our expectations regarding economic data from now until the end of the year.

World: is the best part of the recovery behind us?

JP Morgan Global PMI Manufacturing Index, data from Bloomberg

North America

The fourth wave of the COVID-19 pandemic is in full swing and the news remains concerning. The number of new cases daily is up significantly around the world, particularly in countries like Israel, the United Kingdom and the United States, where a good proportion of the population has been vaccinated. Data from the U.S. suggests that the vaccination campaign is going nowhere, especially in more republican states, creating a major risk to the economic recovery in the coming quarters. In short, the Delta variant, which is much more aggressive than earlier strains, is a major adversary of non-U.S. economic projections and remains the biggest macroeconomic risk factor.

Financial markets

After eight months, the financial markets have once again produced attractive returns for investors in 2021. Natural resources, as we expected at the beginning of the year, produced impressive returns led by a rebound of oil and metals, such as copper. Stock exchanges are posting generally positive returns, at nearly 20% in North America and over 15% globally. Not surprisingly, the main bond indexes are posting negative returns due to high interest rates since the beginning of the year. In our view, the biggest surprise is the under-performance of emerging markets, which have suffered because of regulatory changes in China over the course of the year. The Chinese government is trying to limit the influence of large companies, particularly in the technology sector.
